

Triple Constraints also known as the Iron Triangle

The reality is that if you change one constraint, one or the other constraint(s) must change. For example, if you change how much time you have (that is you want it quicker), then either the scope must be reduced or you may need to have additional resources or you may have to reduce the scope and increase the number of resources.